DISSERTATION

“Uneven Strength of the Leviathan: Political Cleavages and State-building in Mexico and Colombia”

Why do states govern more effectively in some parts of their territory than in others? My dissertation examines the historical origins of state (in)capacity in Mexico and Colombia from a subnational perspective. It constructs a theoretical framework for explaining spatial variation in a state’s ability to perform core functions, centered on the sociopolitical composition of state-building coalitions and societal resistance to them during formative historical periods. I test several implications of this framework using novel historical datasets compiled through extensive archival research in both countries. Analysis of original, hand-coded, municipal-level datasets demonstrates that insurgent activity following the Mexican Revolution has had an enduring effect on the post-revolutionary state’s ability to exercise fiscal authority and monopolize violence. In Colombia, territorial patterns of state capacity development followed a partisan logic, with decisive periods of state-building under the Liberal Party leading to weakened institutional capacity in more Conservative areas. The study uncovers the political roots of institutional weakness and provides new insight into the origins of state capacity and the process of state-building across geographic space.
